

Are discounts beneficial for Eniac?

A verdict on our discount strategy
Full order-line history, Jan 2017 - Mar 2018

Discounting isn't the exception!

95.94% of our products have been discounted at least once. This isn't a seasonal promo tactic — it's how we sell.

Does Revenue grow with discounts?

- No Correlation: Revenue changes do not follow discount trends
- Seasonality Wins: Seasonal events (Black Friday) drive growth, not price cuts

But that discount depth isn't paying off evenly

- The Core Revenue Drivers: Storage and Smartphones are our financial engines, generating over 55% of total revenue
- The Efficiency Gap: Laptops, despite being a high-tech item, generate the least among major categories.

What to protect, what to fix

Profit core: Storage & Smartphone — lowest discounts (14%-16%), still our biggest volume and revenue ✓

Traffic bait: Protection & Cable/Adapter — steep discounts (~31%) on cheap items ✓

Margin killer: Laptop — mid-pack discount (21%), bottom-tier payoff ✗

Analysis of Unit Sales Volumes against Average Category Discount Rates

Storage: discount depth doesn't reliably buy revenue

Learnings

Discounting is not paying for itself

- Across seasons, categories, and our best-performing product line, deeper discounts did not reliably produce more revenue
- Discounting has become a habit, not a strategy
- The data does not support that it's paying for itself.

Recommendations

Storage: Keep high revenue

Storage achieves its highest volume (~20,000 units) at one of our lowest discount rates (~15%).

Low discounts for high revenue and high volume categories

Accessories: Keep high volume

High discounts (30%+) on cheap covers and cables drive high volume on low costs (~3€).

High discounts for low revenue and high volume categories

Premium: Stop discounting

Laptop's ~21% discount isn't buying volume — it sits mid-pack on units sold despite a top-tier discount.

Customers of high-end hardware have both the budget and the immediate need

Seasonality is main sales driver

Due to holidays and vacation sales are low in January, March, and July. Sales always spike in November.
